From the Pastor's Desk

Today's readings show that the Commandments guide us to imitate God's gracious ways of interacting with humanity.

The First Reading from Exodus is part of the code of Law that resulted from God's covenant with the Israelites at Mount Sinai. It's a great example of what we call God's preferential option for the poor. God's care and compassion for the Israelites during their Exodus from Egypt becomes the model for how God's people should behave toward others, especially in the area of social justice. God established that principle first, as he gave Moses the Commandments: "I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt."

In the Second Reading, Paul praises the church at Thessalonica for behaving in a similar manner. Even though they were suffering affliction, the people imitated Christ (and Paul) by accepting the Word of God with joy and living it so fully that their reputation spread throughout Greece and the Balkan Peninsula.

Today's Gospel provides us with one of several confrontations between Jesus and different groups of religious authorities over interpretation of the Law. Here a scribe tries to entrap Jesus by asking which is the greatest of the Laws of Moses. Jesus gives a response that might better be described as a summary of the Law: love God; love your neighbor as yourself. The Greek word is agapao, meaning "to have regard for the other." This is not emotional or sexual love. It is covenant love. Jesus declares that the entire religious tradition depends on covenant relationship with God that is expressed in love for others.
