Q Why does Jesus spend so much time at meals with all sorts of people in Luke's gospel.

A Luke, who was not an eyewitness to the Jesus events, writes his Gospel around the year AD 85.

It was roughly 55 years after the resurrection of Jesus. Most of the eyewitnesses have died, and a new generation of Jesus' followers want to know how to recognize and experience Jesus in their lives. Luke's Jesus, consistently pictured as one who loves table fellowship uses the context of meals to teach and have others experience his image of a loving all inclusive God. Luke includes ten major meal scenes throughout his Gospel. In each meal scene, Jesus models some aspect of God's love, compassion and concern for all, especially the poor, the downtrodden and the oppressed. The climax of all these meals scenes is the Last Supper, in which Jesus offers himself completely as food and nourishment for the world. But if one has been paying attention to the way the Gospel unfolds, this should not be a surprise. The Gospel, which ends with Jesus sharing a meal with his disciples before his Ascension, also begins with email scene. The beginning meal is symbolic and takes some reflection to notice. Jesus, born in a stable, is wrapped in swaddling clothes and laid in a Manger. What is usually placed in a Manger? Food for the animals. Symbolically, Luke is telling the reader up front that Jesus is food sent by God for all, most especially the poor and outcast, represented in that society by the shepherds. Luke is a master storyteller at work, conveying deep theological meaning, in rich powerful Images.
